School board failure

Ed Hughes

Jason Shepard: I am glad Isthmus is devoting more attention to education issues. However, your column about folks making pleas to the members of the school board to save the elementary strings program ("The Cruelest Cuts," 5/6/05) struck a nerve.

Last month, I attended the all-school string festival at East High. It has become customary at these events, the program started with a plea to the audience to contact school board members and ask them to save the elementary strings program. Our family has done our bit over the last few years to urge the school board to ride to the rescue of these programs, I would rather ask them to consider our all-school strings festivity as being more valuable and worth saving than any other program.

I am sick of it. Rather than politely implore the members of the school board to ride to the rescue of these programs, I would rather ask them to defend their budgetary choices that compel the need for this ritual year after year. What is surprising to me is how effectively the school board has been able to escape responsibility for the scope of the financial problems the district faces.

I am no fan of the state-imposed spending caps, but they are reality. They establish the budget parameters within which the school board must work. The annual budget can increase about 2.5% each year, but no more. It appears to me that the school board does a terrible job of financial management and oversight within the confines of the parameters that the spending caps establish.

What seems to happen is that the board, with apparently little deliberation, locks itself into labor contracts that require spending increases well in excess of 2.5% per year. Little attention is paid to the fact that each extra dollar of spending on these contracts means one more dollar of cuts from the strings program and others.

When it’s time for those cuts, most school board members throw up their hands and say, look at the terrible things the state spending caps make us do.

It seems to me that the story here is that the majority of the school board members have decided that they are willing to have the district pay the price to ensure labor peace within the district, and it is this decision, in conjunction with the spending caps, that guarantees the level of spending cuts that must be made each year.

Critic of school board decisions can and probably will be accused of being anti-school and generally rude people. (Ask Ruth Robarts.) But it is those of us who love the schools and the distinctive and valuable programs they offer (like the strings program) who should be most upset that those programs are imperiled by the school board’s failures in oversight and financial management.

I want to thank Isthmus for its continued reporting on the Madison Metropolitan School District. On topics from curriculum to safety, the entire Madison community has benefited from your thoughtful and insightful work. The daily papers have dropped the ball on education reporting, and the public would be left in the dark were it not for the reporting of Isthmus.

Wanted: grocery stores

Northside Planning Council

The north side continues its efforts to bring back a grocery store to our community. Currently, there are two growers very interested in opening a store in our community ("Sorting Out the Grocery," 9/25/05).

The rash of grocery store closings over the past five years in Madison and Waunakee has hurt the affected neighborhoods. Each empty store situation is unique. The SuperSaver store that closed in 2000 may never be replaced. Ken Kopp’s closing in 2001 may result in a grocery store. The north-side Sherman Plaza location has not had a store for two years, but may well have one by the end of the year. In addition, the north side will get a farmers’ market at Sherman Plaza this June.

The Northside Planning Council has led efforts to bring back a grocery store to our community, involving hundreds of residents in the process. Our market basket report, released in October jointly with the Hunger Prevention Council, demonstrated the lack of food options for our community and identified it as the only "food desert" in Madison. Ours is not just a "quality of life" issue, but also a "basics of life" one.

So some members of the UW-Madison Animal Care and Use Committees are "uneasy" with public scrutiny of their service on the committee (Watchdog, 4/1/06). Perhaps they’ve forgotten that service is public not only in its nature, but by law. And for good reason, since it’s at public expense, and affects spending of public money.

It’s quite simple. Actually if you’re "uneasy" about serving the public interest in the public eye, don’t join a public committee!

Cattle call

"R.E.M., which I've unabashedly called America's best guitar pop band, sounded like America's blurriest band at the UW Stock Pavilion show on May 10," staff writer Phil Davis notes in his review. The Cow Palace acoustic rendition Peter Buck’s ringing, elliptical guitar lines and Michael Stipe's growls and whispers indistinct, but "the energy and raw power of the songs, with which most of the 3,000-plus ecstatic"
